Reason.Shelton Water Pumping Station The Shelton Water Pumping Station is a historic water pumping facility located in the central part of Shelton, Connecticut. It consists of a series of three buildings, one of which is a garage, and is located on Shelton Center Road. Built in 1888, it is a well-preserved example of the late Victorian period of American industrial design. It was added to the National Register of Historic Places on April 20, 2009. Description and history The Shelton Water Pumping Station stands about northwest of the center of Shelton, on the east side of Shelton Center Road a short way south of the Vernon-Blakely bridge. It is a large rectangular building with stone trim, set on a concrete foundation. Its main block is three stories in height, with a tile roof covered in dark slate. It is dominated by a large gable-capped tower in the center, which rises to a height of. On the first floor, the main block is open on its eastern side, with a porch extending across its width. It is bordered at the front and rear by two-story wing additions. The garage is accessed through a metal-clad door to its left. The facility was built in 1888 as a private water pumping station to serve a nearby mansion. It is the only known surviving example of such a facility in the state. It has some similarity to the surviving facilities in South Norwalk and West Hartford, but is in a transitional stage between the styles. The original owners were W. H. and Nellie A. Wiswell, who also ran a retail shoe store in the same building. In 1887 they sold the building, and the subsequent owner expanded the building and added the two-story wings. Conventionally, when printing a letter document or the like on a recording sheet, ink is applied by means of a recording head onto the surface of the recording sheet. The recording head and the recording sheet are driven in steps to thereby accomplish the printing. In such a printing system, it is necessary to replenish the ink which is consumed. When the ink consumed in this manner cannot be replenished during the printing operation, there is a possibility that an undesirable printing error will occur. A printer which includes a ink reservoir for storing the ink to be supplied is disclosed in, for example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,462,078. The ink reservoir in this example is mounted on a carriage of the printer. One end of an ink supplying tube is attached to the reservoir and the other end is attached to a recording head. In the arrangement disclosed in this example, the ink is supplied from the reservoir to the recording head through the ink supplying tube. In this case, the ink can be consumed by printing of one letter without interruption of printing. However, when the desired quantity of ink is exhausted, the recording head is required to be disassembled and then the ink reservoir is replaced with a new one. The same procedure has to be performed when the ink reservoir is exhausted. Such an ink replenishment system is inconvenient and time consuming. Furthermore, even if the tank used in this example is provided with an ink indicating means for indicating the ink level, the tank cannot be replaced with a new one when the ink indicated by the ink indicating means is exhausted. As a result, the user has to disassemble the tank to check the ink level. For e79caf774b
